English Commentary, Dutch Commentary and Spanish Commentary. There are many situations in which misalignment and/or malfunctioning of the occlusion between the upper and lower teeth can cause loss of speech. The most common condition is due to mal-occlusion between the maxilla and mandible where the mandible is rotated outwardly from the maxilla. The most common mal-occlusion condition is the Class III mal-occlusion, or Skeletal Class III mal-occlusion, where the mandible rotates outwardly more than 45° relative to the maxilla. This mal-occlusion condition is also known as prognathism. Various dental treatment methods have been proposed for correcting or overcoming mal-occlusion. For example, it is common practice to use orthodontic ("ortho-", "ortho-") appliances or orthodontic brackets and wires. Such appliances or brackets are placed on the maxillary and mandibular teeth in order to apply corrective forces to the teeth. In such cases, the treatment can involve the application of appropriate forces in order to coerce the patient's mal-occluded teeth into a new mal-occluding condition. An alternative dental treatment method is to use removable orthodontic appliances or "aligners" that are frequently custom-made for the patient. Typically, the appliance is configured to be worn for a period of time during which the forces applied to the teeth are gradually increased during a number of treatment sessions, and then followed by a retention period that allows the teeth to move to the desired final position during a number of subsequent sessions. There are various problems with the use of orthodontic appliances. For example, orthodontic braces or appliances are generally regarded as unpleasant to many patients. Additionally, orthodontic appliances 1cdb36666d
